Synopsis

A sidewinder missile ignites and fails to disengage from the F35 on a live firing exercise, burning through part of the wing. The pilot is forced to eject and the aircraft is destroyed. With no obvious mechanical reason for it to misfire, the new launch integration software is examined and malware is suspected.

Nothing Bad explores the cyber-risks that were exploited by sophisticated criminals accessing the personal details of contractors, consultants and Defence personnel. Through seemingly minimal transgressions – “I did nothing bad” – the story skilfully displays the significant impact on the organisations affected, international reputations; and the personal impact. Rob, a former pilot and management consultant, Suzanne, also formerly RAAF Engineer and now senior manager at Sempiterna, a company designing components for commercial and military aerospace use; and Dale, their Air Vice Marshall friend and colleague face the consequences none of us wish to experience.

"I've never heard such animated conversations on cyber. Really brought home some real life recognition of situations where we could improve our behaviours."

"Very well performed. Comments from audiences at both sessions were convinced the actors were real Military Police. The engagement has prompted many conversations about cyber security since, included everyone introspectively assessing themselves."

Participant, Air Force

DALE: Do you have any idea how this could have happened, Suzy?

SUZANNE: How could I? I'm just processing what you've told us. Sempiterna's security is world class.

DALE: Someone has accessed your systems.

SUZANNE: Impossible.

DALE: Do you have any suspicions at all as to anyone at the company who might bear a grudge or need money?

SUZANNE: Absolutely not! Our vetting is unbelievably strict.

DALE: And there has been nothing unusual recently, nothing that in retrospect seems suspicious?
